Characterization of the mitochondrial ATPase from Neurospora crassa: comparison with bacterial F₀F₁ ATPases. ATPases from mitochondria, which are involved in the production of energy in aerobic organisms, have been purified by solubilizing in chaotropic agents. The ATPase from Neurospora crassa has been purified to near homogeneity by two methods, an affinity chromatography on ATP-sepharose and an affinity chromatography on (dithiothreitol)-2-S,S'-dinitro-NADP. The specific activity of the purified ATPase is 250 μmol of Pi/mg per min, an order of magnitude lower than the specific activities of the ATPase from other organisms. The ATPase from Neurospora is particularly sensitive to ATP analogues.

Aspartate-2-amino-6-phosphate is a potent inhibitor and is competitive with ATP, while the pseudosubstrate inosine-5'-monophosphate is a non-competitive inhibitor. The purified ATPase is also susceptible to the group-specific reagents chloriodoacetate, 2-bromo-palmitate and N,N'-dicyclohexylcarbodiimide. The Neurospora ATPase resembles to a great extent the bacterial F₀F₁ ATPase, but some differences are detected: the inhibition by the group-specific reagents and the inhibition by NADP are different; the stabilization of the inorganic phosphate by ADP is also different. The detection of a non-luminescent ATPase activity would allow the characterization of mitochondrial ATPases in Neurospora crassa in an electrophoretic system free of ATPases from prokaryotes and chloroplasts.// Code generated by protoc-gen-go.
