ATP-sensitive K⁺ channels (KATP channels) are ATP-sensitive K⁺ channels located in the plasma membrane of a number of cell types. These channels are often regulated and mediate important physiological functions, such as relaxation of smooth muscle and ischemic preconditioning. We, and others have reported that expression of the Kir6.1 subunit of the ATP-sensitive K⁺ channel, and also the sulfonylurea receptor 1 (SUR1), are reduced in a number of model systems of diabetes including pancreatic islets of HFD and db/db mice, and insulinomas of Zucker obese rats (ZF and ZDR rats), Sprague-Dawley rats, and Cynomolgus monkeys. These observations suggest a contribution of decreased channel expression to the pathogenesis of diabetes. We have also shown that acute or chronic exposure to high glucose decreases expression of both SUR1 and the Kir6.1 subunit of the ATP-sensitive K⁺ channel in insulinoma cell lines. Furthermore, we have shown that the decrease in channel protein expression occurs via a post-transcriptional mechanism. We have recently shown that ERK2 activation promotes the channel-specific post-transcriptional mechanisms. The ERK2 signaling pathway is activated in human
