Injury to the retina results in an immediate and progressive death of the neuroretina due to an acute ischemia caused by an increase in intracellular pressure. This pressure increase is the result of a rapid trans-retinal and vitreous flow that creates a series of conditions that induces an obliterative vasogenic inflammatory reaction, retinal detachment, and progressive degenerative processes in the retina and choroid. Previous studies in our laboratory suggested that neuroprotective strategies applied after an ischemic injury to the retina provide beneficial effects on the physiological outcome of the injured retina. A major limitation in identifying beneficial therapeutic strategies is the fact that such strategies can only be evaluated in the context of a comprehensive study of visual function. This is possible only after a comprehensive study of the mechanisms of post-traumatic vision loss has been completed. The long-term objective of this proposal is to evaluate the effectiveness of the neuroprotective strategies in promoting recovery from different types of injury. The major specific objective of this proposal is to characterize the dynamic recovery of vision function from ischemic and traumatic retinal injury. The hypothesis to be tested in this application is that a post-injury improvement in retinal function following a therapeutic treatment that promotes survival of retinal cells will improve the recovery of visual function. To achieve these goals, we will create a model of ischemic and traumatic injuries in the retina. We will perform a comprehensive study of the dynamics of retinal and visual function recovery after retinal ischemic and traumatic injuries. These experiments will be performed in adult albino Sprague-Dawley rats. Using an array of electrophysiological, behavioral, and functional magnetic resonance imaging tools, this study will address three Specific Aims. Aim 1: To characterize
